SUGAR OR SUGAR SUBSTITUTE?

Although sugar substitutes or artificial sweeteners satisfy your craving for sweets, they are by no means like the real thing (sugar). Saccharin is the most common of the sugar substitutes, and is 350 times sweeter than sugar. Saccharin which has no caloric value, makes uncooked food taste sweeter. However, when it is added to foods during cooking, it may make the food taste bitter. When you use saccharin you should add it towards the end of the cooking cycle or immediately afterwards; this will help to eliminate the bitter taste.

Other sugar substitutes include: Sweet 'N Low, Sugar Twins and Sweet Lite. These differ from saccharin because they contain carbohydrates (lactose, fructose, dextrose or sorbitol). These carbohydrates are usually alone or in combination with saccharin. These other sugar substitutes may be added to foods that require cooking or baking without producing a bitter taste. However, any sugar substitute, when used in excess, can make foods taste bitter. When using the sugar substitutes, the best method is to use less than the recipe calls for and then slowly add more until it reaches the desired taste.

Because of sugar's chemical structure, it makes cakes, candy and cookies expand as they cook. Saccharin does not have the same characteristics; however, the dry granulated sugar substitutes perform more like sugar and therefore should be used in these products. If you plan to do a lot of cooking using the sugar substitutes, it would be best to write for recipes to the company whose sweetener you plan to use.

If you decide to adapt your favorite recipe for use with a sugar substitute, remember to read your labels carefully. The sweetness of a tablespoon of sugar substitute is much greater than that of the same amount of sugar. Because of this you will need to use less than the recipe calls for.

VFBF Board Approved Study at May Meeting

RICHMOND - A major effort to improve farmers' income through better marketing and food distribution has been launched by the Virginia Farm Bureau Federation.

The VFBF Board of Directors approved a "Greater Marketing Opportunities Study" at its May 24 meeting. The board also set up a blue-ribbon committee and appropriated $10,000 to finance the study.

VFBF President Robert B. Delano said the study is "one of the most important in the field of marketing in Virginia in recent history."

Marketing has been singled out as one of the major problems affecting farmers' income.

While food prices have been going up in grocery stores, dollars paid to farmers have been going down, Delano noted. The farmers' share from a market basket of food, as compiled by the United States Department of Agriculture (USDA) is an average of 39 percent.

Objectives of the study, which has been under consideration for several years, will be to recommend programs to improve the marketing system and food distribution and purchasing system to improve the income opportunities of farmers as well as the quality of products to consumers.

The committee will study current systems of food marketing and merchandising, to develop more efficient systems, and innovations of marketing designed to return a larger portion of the consumer food dollar to producers while providing economic and other benefits for consumers.

The committee will have the additional responsibility of preparing estimates of staff and capital requirements to implement new or modified marketing systems, and determine the role Farm Bureau should play in implementation or coordination.
